Hongkons, July 7rm, 1876.

THE opening, on the 80th ultimo, of a section of the little railway between Shanghai and Woosung cannot be regarded as other than a mamorable event in the history of foreign relations with China. It is true that the line has been completed only as far as Kungwang, a distance of little-more than four miles, and the policy, from a financial point of view, of opening it half-way may be questioned. But the projectors are naturally anxious to see the undertaking an accoinplished fact, and the opening of a portion of it may well be regarded as a pledge of the successful completion of the whole. The construction of the first railway in China is more important as signifying the triumph that has been won over obstinate prejudice and innerant obstructiveness than from any great commercial results likely to arise from the free. undertaking itself. It may pay well, and it is sincerely to be honed that it will do so But it will scarcely prove a fortune to the proprietors. Bailways, as a general rule, are not remunerative investments for capital; some few, of course, return a large percentage where there is a heavy goods troffic, but the impority yield only a moderate dividend. It is questionable whether they would do more than this in China. They would, however, foster trade and Everywhere quicken the pulse of commerce. They are the most potent agents for developing the resources of a country, of whatever kind. By giving the means of cheap and speedy transit they lend an impulse to mining enterprise, stimulate inanufacturing operations, and render agricolumni industry more lemunerative by throwing open markets for pro-They have rarely failed to im prove the condition of a district; they sweeps resistlessly; they are with the telegraph, the means of communication by which the life of nations is quickened into activity; and stagnation, social, political, and commercial, averted.

Chinese officials and literati think that the Central Kingdom is better without those civilising and reforming agents. Has not China, they say, done without them for ares: and flourished notwithstanding? Has she not, also, means of water communication almost without rival? It is satisfactory to learn that the line is so popular with the Chinese at Shanghai. The news will spread to other ports and districts, and will do much to dissipate the unreasoning dislike of the railway now so widely felt. Little by little, perhaps, the people will become convinced that, so far from injuring existing industries and occupations, the railway will extend them and promote new ones as well. The fear of the interference with Feng-shui will disappear, in most instances, liko magio if it can be shown that the people concerned are to profit considerably by the construction of a line. Extracts AT EVE The shadows lengthen as the evening falls, The deer lie couched within the fermy brake. From hawthorn bush the plaintive blackbird calls With liquid notes, that mournful echoes wake: The water-fowly have left the lonely lake,

To range themselves upon its mornia stra Where sleepily the murmuring wavelets break. And and Calypso doth in marble stand. With fluger on her lips, sweet silence to command. Selene dons her regent diadem, Bright Venus glitlers in the opal west, Of purest ray, on some fair lady's breast Anon the nightingale, with russes vest,

As thines a instrons solitary gem. In gurgling melody pours forth his lay; As meck-eyed Madelcine, her looks addressed Towards the earth, with paces slow doth stray. And 'heath the heavy becches takes her pensive way. AUSTIN GRIPPIN.

A NAVAL ANECDOTE The following anecdote will be read with interest :- "1780, Jan. 16, Sir George Rodney encountered the Spanish Admiral Langara off Cape St. Vincent. The action, which continued till two hours after midnight, was probably, unconscious that they are c well contested, but the victory of the English was complete. Langara's own ship of 80 guns was taken, and three ships of the line besides, while four others were either sunk, blown up, or driven ashore. Langara bimself was brought a prisoner into the Bay of Gibraltar, and conducted to lodgings in the town.
